Handling property transactions

The agent that you can appoint with a financial POA can handle your real as well as personal property transactions. Other than these, he can also handle trust, estate and other beneficiary transactions as well as annuity and insurance transactions. You can also entrust such an attorney-in-fact with the responsibility to deal with the transactions of financial institutions such as banks.

Dealing with business operations

He can also help you deal with various business operations, and even run your business if you are ill or incapacitated to handle the same. With a financial free power of attorney form, you can choose the types of powers that you want to grant him with - either by crossing those powers out that you do not wish to bestow on your agent and checking the ones that you want to grant on him.

Other operations

An agent can also help with litigation and claims, tax matters, retirement benefits, and even Government benefits like Unemployment compensation, Medicare or Social Security. You can give him access to Safe deposit box, and even act on your behalf to make gifts to charities or individuals. Your agent is legally obligated to act for you and work for your best interest, maintain proper records of each of your transactions and not engage in something that can give rise to a conflict between your and his own interests. He will not mix his property and transactions with his own.
